Abstract

This report uses the United States Decennial Census data to investigate the changes in racial demographics across Pittsburgh neighborhoods from 1940 to 2020. Because the census does not provide neighborhood-level demographic data directly, this report relied on a guide that correlates census tracts per decade to the current 2020 neighborhood boundary lines written by Christopher Lemery. Using Microsoft Access to process and analyze the data, this report organizes and visualizes the changing racial composition of each neighborhood by decade. This report highlights substantial recent demographic shifts, particularly a significant decline in the white population, a change of more diverse neighborhoods that are historically separated, and some neighborhoods that continue to stay segregated. Although legislation has criminalized racial discrimination in housing, many factors continue to prohibit racially diverse neighborhoods throughout Pittsburgh.

Keywords: Race, racial demographic, Pittsburgh, neighborhood, census, census data, census tract, population

Racial Composition in Pittsburgh by Neighborhood: 1940-2020

The Decennial Census from the United States Census Bureau is a wealth of demographic data. It is widely available at national, state, county, census tracts, block groups, places, Zip Code Tabulation Areas (ZCTA), and more. However, neighborhood-level data is not directly available, making it challenging to examine local demographic changes. Especially in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, the “City of Neighborhoods,” the neighborhoods offer distinctive social and cultural units. The data given by the census is not easily recognizable by Pittsburgh residents in a small enough set to be useful. This lack of data prohibits the trends we can observe Accessing consistent demographic data across eighty years compounds this difficulty. Over time, neighborhoods and census tracts ebb and flow like rivers, and over the decades, they are not at all like what they were eighty years ago due to changes in population, economics, and changes within the Census Bureau and how it organizes geographical regions. As a result, analyzing demographic changes within geographic units like neighborhoods requires extensive data collection and substantial manipulation and alignment of historical and modern spatial boundaries.

Pittsburgh is a majority-white city, but this generalization obscures significant patterns of inequality and race separation across its neighborhoods. Various historical forces, such as the practices of redlining, disinvestment, urban renewal, and the effects of federal legislation, such as the Fair Housing Act of 1968, have influenced the distribution of racial groups. The trends in demographic changes will not represent causation, but the correlation between them should be noted. This report examines changes in racial demographic populations by neighborhood by decade in Pittsburgh, PA, from 1940 to 2020.

Methodology

This report used decennial census data from 1940 through 2020 to analyze racial demographic change by neighborhood. The census data was sourced from Social Explorer, an online data library. A dataset was exported in comma-separated values (.csv) file format for each census decade, only including census tract-level data for Allegheny County. Each dataset contained essential variables such as the Federal Information Processing Standards (FIPS) code, the name of the census tract, the total population, and racial groupings, including White, African American or Black, American Indian or Alaska Native, Asian, Native Hawaiian or Other Pacific Islander, Other Race, and Two or More Races. Two or More Races is one category where people identify as a part of two or more racial groups.

Each decade's data was exported in a separate file, resulting in nine individual .csv files. Due to the volume of data—over four thousand census records—it was impractical to process the information in spreadsheet software like Microsoft Excel or by hand. Microsoft Access was chosen as the primary tool for data handling because of its robust querying capabilities and the author's familiarity with the software. Structured Query Language (SQL) within Access allows for efficient data transformation and aggregation that would be infeasible to perform manually.

A critical step in this methodology is linking historical census tracts to modern Pittsburgh neighborhood boundaries. This report relied on the Pittsburgh Census Tracts 1940–2020 guide created by Christopher Lemery (2025). This guide maps census tracts to neighborhoods by decade and includes multipliers to allocate population data when a census tract spans more than one neighborhood. Because the boundaries of census tracts have changed significantly over the eighty years, the guide is essential for creating consistent geographic comparisons over time.

This guide was reformatted into a usable table by manipulating the table to have each census tract and multiplier reference a specific year and neighborhood instead of being grouped. This restructured data was imported into Microsoft Access, and the census data files into respective tables. The guide was reformatted into a usable table by ungrouping the data and assigning each tract and multiplier combination a specific year and neighborhood designation. This restructured data was imported into Microsoft Access and joined with the census tract data. Through two queries, each census record was multiplied by the appropriate neighborhood multiplier and then grouped by neighborhood and decade to generate population totals and demographic breakdowns.

The neighborhood population totals were calculated using an Access query, and the expression that multiplies each tract's population by its corresponding multiplier sums the results. Null values are handled using the Nz function to account for missing data. The expression also rounded the results to the nearest whole person. The following is a generalized expression used in the first query.

Round( Sum(
        Nz(
            [Census Data] ! [Current Population] , 0
        Nz(
            [Neighborhood Year and Tract] ! [Multiplier] , 0

A similar query was made to calculate the percentage of each racial group within a neighborhood by dividing the demographic total by the neighborhood's total population and multiplying by one hundred. This process was repeated for each racial category across all neighborhoods and decades.

(Sum(
    Nz(
        [Census Data] ! [Current_African American or Black] , 0
    Nz(
        [NeighborhoodYT] ! [Multiplier] , 0
(Sum(
    Nz(
        [Census Data] ! [Current_Total] , 0
    Nz(
        [Neighborhood Year and Tract]![Multiplier],0
))*100

Together, these queries assembled the data needed for the report.

For the report, each neighborhood was kept on a page in the final report to easily examine the data for an entire neighborhood without needing to flip between pages. The top portion of each page presented the population table to understand the total number of people and each race. The lower half featured a 100% stacked area chart to visualize the racial composition over time. This format allowed for quick neighborhood comparison while standardizing the visual representation of demographic changes. The final report comprised ninety-two pages, requiring a table of contents to enable users to locate specific neighborhoods efficiently.

Results

The citywide analysis confirmed Pittsburgh's white population was declining over the eighty years. In 1940, approximately 670,000 white residents lived in the city; by 2020, this number had dropped to around 347,000. In the same period, African American or Black residents stayed roughly the same while varying around 86,000. Other racial groups, including Asian and American Indian, grew substantially and comprised approximately 15 percent of the city's population by 2020.

Neighborhood-level analysis revealed divergent trends. For example, the white population in Allegheny Center accounted for approximately 90 percent of residents in 1970 but declined to around 60 percent by 2020. Meanwhile, the African American population increased to roughly 20 percent, and the Asian population reached around 10 percent. In Greenfield, a historically white neighborhood, the non-white population increased more recently. By 2010, around 10 percent of Greenfield residents identified as non-white; by 2020, that figure had risen to approximately 20 percent.

In 1940 and 1950, the Middle Hill neighborhood's white population comprised approximately 10 percent of the total; the rest was African American or Black. Beginning in 1960, the neighborhood became almost exclusively Black, a demographic pattern that persisted through 2010. Point Breeze, on the other hand, remained predominantly white throughout the timeframe, although by 2020, approximately 8 percent of the population identified as Black and an additional 8 percent as different races.

Discussion

The data demonstrates that Pittsburgh has experienced considerable demographic changes at the city and neighborhood levels. Although the overall population has declined, the racial composition has shifted in ways that reflect broader social and economic patterns. Specific neighborhoods, such as Allegheny Center, became more racially homogenous over time, while others, like Point Breeze and Greenfield, only began to show signs of increased diversity in recent decades.

These changes suggest that although the Fair Housing Act of 1968 criminalized racial discrimination in housing, its effects have been uneven. Some neighborhoods have increased their diversity over time, others have remained relatively separated, and some have only seen an increase in diversity in recent decades. The differences between diversity may be due to economic, social, or other factors beyond the scope of this report.

Using the 100% area chart in this report helps mitigate the impact of population decline on the chart for the reader, which affects the city as a whole. By visualizing the proportion of each racial group within neighborhoods over time, the report provides a clearer picture of how local demographics have evolved differently than the city's.

Limitations

Several limitations, including the data source, guide, and historical census data inconsistencies, hold this report back. First, the United States Census did not consistently collect detailed racial data across all decades. For example, data on Asian populations were not separately reported until the 1970 Census. As a result, specific racial categories appear as zeros in earlier decades, not because those populations were absent but because they were accounted for in the other category.

Second, the methodology relied heavily on the Lemery guide, which, while extremely valuable, is incomplete for some census years. Specifically, the guide did not include 1960 census tracts with letters and number labels such as "WLB-149". The lack of population for these neighborhoods in 1960 could affect the trends in the chart. This omission led to missing data for specific neighborhoods, such as South Side Slopes, for the 1960 decade. There was another lack of data in 1990 in Summer Hill and Morningside, and the reason behind this was not readily present.

Third, the inherent limitations of census data, such as sampling error and underreporting, are present in all large-scale surveys and must be considered when interpreting the results. Finally, this study was limited to the period of 1940 and 2020 since those were the years covered by the available neighborhood mapping guide.

Conclusion

While working to reduce this report's limitations and in processing historical population data, this report provides the opportunity to examine trends in racial demographics between 1940 and 2020. While it is challenging to assign tracts to these neighborhoods, this data level is recognizable for Pittsburgh residents. This report can be a groundwork for additional research and analysis into why these trends have occurred.

While the reasons for these changes are multifaceted and beyond the scope of this report, the data reveal unequal patterns of racial distribution that persist across many neighborhoods. There is evidence of increasing diversity in the city, but the legacy of the separation of races and inequality remains visible. This work offers a foundation for further inquiry and policy discussion related to housing, equity, and urban planning in Pittsburgh.
